Main Ideas

1. It was part of the Red Scare. It also showed anti-immigrant prejudice.
2. Workers faced violence, and they didn't always win the things they wanted from the strikes.
3. The main goal of the quota system was to restrict the number of immigrants that came to the United States.
4. Alfred B. Fall, Harding's secretary of the interior, was most closely associated with the Teapot Dome scandal.
5. Advertisers began to use psychology to sell goods. They tried to link their products to youth, beauty, and popularity so that people would buy them.

Thinking Critically

1. Possible response: Isolationism and nativism both showed how people didn't want to deal with different people. The Red Scare, the rise of the Ku Klux Klan, and the quota system show Americans' distrust of people from different backgrounds.
2. The increase in the standard of living and the gross national product were signs of the success of American business in the 1920s. Weaknesses in some industries such as farming and mining and large amounts of debt were signs that things were not as good as they seemed.
